The Art Of War was written in the 6th century BC by the Chinese military theorist, strategist and author, Sun Tzu. Sun Tzu wrote his masterpiece on the art of war as a guide to military strategy and organization. The system, according to Sun Tzu, is to 'attain excellence by discipline and attention', and was based on the principle that there are five essential factors that must be combined in an army, and that all war is but a series of battles and campaigns fought with these five things. The books cover tactics, strategy, organization, equipment, and morale. A gifted and determined military leader, Sun Tzu was able to combine his strategic thinking with the practical application of military tactics. After his death, a succession of scholars continued to refine his approach. However, the main contribution of Sun Tzu was to define a set of rules and guidelines for victory in battle, tactics for attaining victory, and strategies for defending a position. In the book, Sun Tzu wrote that the power of a military is equal to the power of its commander-in-chief. A skilled leader is the one who knows how to win the battle while a commander-in-chief is the one who leads the army to victory. He also wrote that a skilled commander should be just, but cruel, and that a skilled army should be only good in numbers and discipline, but be lightly armed.
